

Society for Linguistic Anthropology

Greetings linguistic anthropologists!

One of the lessons from the SLA Futures event, held last autumn and summarized below, is that many SLA members prefer communications that land in our inboxes via our listserv.

Accordingly, and in conjunction with existing vehicles of communication—including the SLA website, SLA social media posts, and project-specific email missives from extended board members—we hope to provide more regular communication from the SLA executive board moving forward.

Please read on if you are interested in the following topics:

- 1. The current composition of the board and extended board
- 2. A report from the SLA Futures event
- 3. Announcement and call for applications for new positions
(Accessibility coordinator; Mentoring coordinator; Virtual programming coordinator)
- 4. Early planning for the next SLA conference and other in-person gatherings

- 6. News and greetings from the JLA, care of the new Editor-in-Chief

1. 2024 Board and Extended Board

The continued health and vibrancy of the SLA depends on the volunteer work of our membership. Many members have served on paper and book award panels, organized in-person and online events for fellow members, participated in language and social justice (LSJ) initiatives, and have otherwise extended the reach and impact of SLA members' work. Thank you!

There is also the labor-intensive work of the extended board, who also volunteer their time. Many thanks to those who recently rotated off the extended board as well as those who have agreed to fill these positions and have already gotten to work.

2. SLA Futures report

On October 17, 2023, the SLA executive board convened an open, virtual meeting with the membership to discuss the future of the field and the organization, which we called “SLA Futures.” The purpose of the meeting was to provide an open forum in which SLA members could gather to share their ideas about the future of SLA and its priorities moving forward.

About fifty people participated in the meeting. After introductory remarks from SLA president Bernard Perley, treasurer Jack Sidnell, and president-elect Summerson Carr, participants split up into five discussion groups. Each group consisted of approximately eight SLA members and a member of the executive board tasked with taking notes and guiding the discussion. Participants tackled two main questions: 1) Over the next two years, given constraints, what should be our top priorities? 2) What are the best ways for SLA members to communicate and convene?

In these discussion groups, members voiced a wide variety of interests and priorities. Sometimes, these concerns were at potential odds, such as the widely stated desire for another in-person SLA conference and the concern that in-person gatherings not only privilege those who are equipped to travel but also increase our carbon footprint. That said, it is clear that the SLA Futures event also generated some common themes.

Below are the five main points of convergence and the concrete steps we are taking to begin addressing them.

- a. Accessibility is a priority for SLA members, particularly concerning SLA events. Members would like to reduce barriers to participation overall. This includes improving access for our members with disabilities, but it also extends to graduate students, international scholars, and members who work outside the academy or in precarious academic posts. While forum participants highlighted the importance of in-person interactions and sought to retain those aspects of conferencing with access in mind, they also highlighted the importance of virtual programming beyond conferences and expressed hope for more of this. Members made clear that accessibility is at stake in everything we do as a society and that it is critical to our success moving forward. To give accessibility the attention it deserves, the SLA is creating two new positions on the board: an accessibility coordinator and a virtual programming coordinator (read below for more information).

- b. Members expressed overwhelming support for a biennial SLA conference and identified many potential benefits of having a regular meeting. Although some members suggested a conference should include at least some virtual elements if financially feasible, most felt that the conference planning should focus on an in-person format at a relatively intimate scale. With these wishes in mind, planning for a 2025 SLA conference is now in its early stages (read below for more information).
- c. Many members emphasized the importance of mentoring, especially for students, early career faculty, and linguistic anthropologists working outside the academy. These were prescient comments, coming as they did right before a very successful mentoring event at the AAA/CASCA meeting in Toronto. They also inspired the need for a dedicated mentoring coordinator, a new position described below.
- d. Members underscored the importance of maintaining and developing the journal. Some participants suggested that JLA consider publishing in languages other than English and/or with translations. Others suggested that the JLA should be open to writing genres other than the academic essay. The search for a new JLA editor proceeded with these goals in mind, and we are thrilled to have Anna Babel on board as the new editor of JLA. You can read her message to the membership below.
- e. Many discussion participants suggested that the SLA should partner and collaborate with other sections, societies, and/or local conferences. Many also noted the importance of encouraging graduate students and other SLA members to organize events like the Talking Politics series that have the potential to reach beyond the subfield and engage broader audiences.

3. New positions

The SLA has established several new positions in response to members' recent feedback. We ask all members to please consider serving in one of these appointed positions. If interested in doing so, please contact esc@uchicago.edu with the name of the position in the header of your email.

We are confident that we can better serve current members and grow the organization by appointing members to the following positions:

ACCESSIBILITY COORDINATOR

Many thanks to the membership, and to the LSJ in particular, for their advocacy for this role and for conducting initial research into possible resources that can help us make the organization more accessible.

ACCESSIBILITY COORDINATOR POSITION DESCRIPTION: The SLA accessibility coordinator will take the lead in planning, promoting, and— in collaboration with members of the extended SLA Board—implementing measures to increase access to all SLA events and publications (including but not limited to the journal, newsletter columns, and digital communications). Accessibility is broadly conceived to facilitate greater participation and opportunities at every level for historically marginalized groups, with particular emphasis on disability, region of residence, language backgrounds, and inequalities based on socio-economic class, race, ethnicity, nationality, gender, and sexuality. In addition to working closely with the SLA executive board to increase and expand access, the SLA accessibility officer will liaise with the AAA Coordinator for Accessibility, Meetings and Conferences, and other AAA sections where appropriate. The Accessibility Coordinator will serve a two-year term.

MENTORING COORDINATOR

Sandhya Narayanan has done much to revamp SLA's mentoring program, work that she took on over and above her work as AAA Program Chair. Members of the SLA program committee Dominika Baran, Grigory Gorbun, Kathe Managan, and Gahyun Sohn also contributed to this important work. The recent success of the program suggests the need for a dedicated position.

MENTORING COORDINATOR POSITION DESCRIPTION: This position aims to help junior scholars become more familiar with the SLA and offer mentoring opportunities for junior scholars and mid-career professionals at both academic institutions and related industries. The new coordinator will work to expand the mentor-mentee network, which involves managing check-ins for mentors-mentees when necessary and pairing new mentors and mentees. Coordination work will also include maintaining and updating the database (i.e. spreadsheet) of current mentor-mentee pairings. The coordinator will also plan at least one in-person mentoring event (such as the 2023 Mentoring Luncheon AAA) and one virtual event annually. Finally, the coordinator will conduct an annual SLA mentorship survey. The mentoring coordinator will serve a two-year term.

VIRTUAL EVENTS COORDINATOR

Consistent with the SLA's interest in sharing and extending the reach of linguistic anthropological scholarship and doing so in accessible ways, we want to encourage and support virtual programming. While virtual programming will not replace a biennial conference, it can supplement it in impactful ways. Please stay tuned as the board drafts a position description for a virtual events coordinator. As with the positions above, do not hesitate to reach out if you are interested in volunteering for the SLA in this role.

4. Conference planning

As many members recall, the last SLA conference was held in Boulder, Colorado in 2022, after several years of COVID-related delays. Attendees were overwhelmingly positive about their experience at the conference, leaving many longing for the next! At the same time, we learned many important lessons from the conference, including the sheer amount of volunteer labor needed to plan for and host a conference of that scale, the financial impact on the organization, and the pros and cons of a hybrid format. With member feedback in mind and with some necessary adjustments, we are in the early stages of planning for a conference that will take place in Chicago in the spring or very early fall of 2025. The next step is to convene a conference committee. If you are interested in participating, please reach out to esc@uchicago.edu with CONFERENCE PLANNING in the header of your email.
